GALLUS GALLUS

Huh, this mutapork tastes like gallus gallus . . .

Long ago, the Ancients sought to solve world hunger by creating chicken meat from stem cells. The scientists based their studies in a sprawling factory and let a computer run the experiments to improve efficiency. Such foresight paid off, because the factory continued its work for many years after the Big Mistake.

The best intentions have a way of turning out badly, though, and after a few monkey slap-slaps, something went wrong with the machinery. Rather than producing only meat, the computer created mutant, humanoid chickens that were intelligent and fiercely independent. Called batch 5/13, the new race was horrified to discover what the world did to their kind. Appalled by the death and exploitation that were the fate of ordinary chickens, the gallus galluses vowed vengeance against humankind.

Gallus galluses are man-sized, bipedal chickens with arms ending in three-fingered hands rather than wings. Although many have feathers, most gallus galluses wear camouflage patterned clothing.
